

REPUBLIC OF KENYA
IN THE HIGH COURT OF KENYA
AT NYERI

Criminal Case 5 of 2008

REPUBLIC.....PROSECUTOR

VERSUS

STEPHEN KURIA MUNENE.....ACCUSED

RULING

When this case came up for hearing before me on 7th April, 2008, Mr. Nderi, learned counsel appearing for the accused indicated to the court that he had a preliminary objection to raise with regard to the prosecution of the accused. Counsel stated that his objection was premised on the purported violation of the accused's constitutional rights enshrined in section 72 (3) (b) of the Constitution of Kenya

Counsel submitted that the accused was arrested on 28th December, 2007 and brought to court on 22nd January, 2008. That was well beyond the stipulated period under the law and accordingly the accused ought to be acquitted.

In response, Ms Orinda learned Principal State Counsel called one, Inspector Charles Kibet, the Investigating Officer to the stand in order to explain the delay if at all. Inspector Kibet explained on oath that he arrested the accused on 28th December, 2007 and locked him up in the cells at the police station. He thereafter commenced investigations. The deceased's wife had been injured in the incident and had been rushed to Murang'a District Hospital unconscious. As she was a crucial witness, the investigating officer needed to record her statement. She was able to do so on 4th January, 2008. Apparently the family of the deceased did not want the police station where the Investigating Officer was based to handle the case. They desired that investigations into the matter be carried out C.I.D Officers from Murang'a. The Investigating Officer thereafter handed over the matter to said officers. As far as the investigating officer was concerned he had concluded the investigations by 5th January, 2008 and he could not therefore understand why the accused was kept in custody until 22nd

January, 2008, when he was brought to court.

Under section 72 (3) of the supreme law of the land, that is the Constitution of Kenya, the accused is required to be arraigned in court on or before the expiry of fourteen (14) days following his arrest on a capital charge. As Justice Mutungi said recently in the case of Ann Njogu & 5 others VS. Republic, MISC.CR.APPL. NO.55 OF 2007 (unreported) whose sentiments I totally agree with:

“... the section is very clear and specific – that the applicants can only be kept in detention or the cells, for up to 24 hours. At the tick of the 60th minute of the 24th hour, if they have not been brought before the court, every minute thereafter of their continued detention is an unmitigated illegality as it is a violation of the fundamental and constitutional rights of the applicants....”

In the circumstances of this case however I would substitute 24 hours with 14 days and 60th minute with the 14th day.

There is a long list of authorities in relation to the right of an accused person to be brought to court within a prescribed period.

On 7th July 2006 in the case of Albanus Mwasia Mutua V Republic (2006) eKLR the court of appeal held that the appellant’s constitutional rights guaranteed under section 72 (3) of the constitution had been grossly violated because he was taken before the trial Magistrate some eight months from the date of his arrest and no explanation at all had been offered for that delay. The court made the following pertinent remarks:

“At the end of the day, it is the duty of the courts to enforce the provisions of the Constitution, otherwise there would be no reason for having those provisions in the first place. The jurisprudence which emerges from the cases we have cited in the judgment appears to be that an unexplained violation of a constitutional right will normally result in an acquittal irrespective of the nature and strength of evidence which may be adduced in support of the charge. In this appeal, the police violated the constitutional right of the appellant by detaining him in their custody for a whole eight months and that, apart from violating his rights under section 72 (3) (b) of the constitution also amounted to a violation of his rights under section 77 (1) of the constitution which guarantees to him a fair hearing within a reasonable time. The deprivation by the police of his right to liberty for a whole eight months before bringing him to court so that his trial could begin obviously resulted in his trial not being held within a reasonable time.

The appellant's appeal must succeed on that ground alone."

In the judgment, the judges of appeal Omolo, Githinji and Deverell JJA with Githinji JA dissenting made reference to several case law concerning violations of fair trial provisions including Ndede V Republic (1991) KLR 567 where the appellant had been arrested without a warrant on 29th September 1987 and was held in detention, in communicado, until 30th

October, 1987 when he was brought before a Magistrate. The period of delay was just over thirty days and Mr. Ndede was not charged with an offence carrying the death penalty. He pleaded guilty to the charges preferred and was convicted on his own plea of guilty and sentenced to long prison terms. He appealed to the High court against the conviction and sentence but the appeal against the conviction was struck out as being incompetent by virtue of section 348 of the Criminal Procedure Code which bars appeals from persons who have been convicted on their own pleas of guilt. The sentences were however, reduced. Mr. Ndede next appealed to the court of appeal and the court, consisting of the late Mr. Justice

Gachuhi, J.A. the late Mr. Justice Masime, J.A. and Mr. Justice Omolo, Ag. J.A.

(as he then was) held that section 348 of the Criminal Procedure Code was not an absolute bar to appeals from persons convicted on their own plea of guilty and that as there was no explanation offered for the delay of some thirty days before Mr. Ndede was brought to court, the trial Magistrate ought not to have accepted Mr. Ndede's plea of guilty. Mr. Ndede's appeal was allowed and his conviction quashed. It did not matter that before convicting Mr. Ndede, the Deputy Public Prosecutor had stated the facts in support of the charges, that Mr. Ndede had admitted those facts and the facts themselves had disclosed the offences charged against him. The court in the Albanus case observed that the;

"Quashing of the convictions must have been on the basis that Ndede's constitutional rights given to him by section 72 (3) (b) of the constitution had been violated and he

entitled to an acquittal."

It is worth noting however that an accused person is not automatically entitled to an acquittal where the prosecution has not been given a chance to offer an explanation for failing to bring him to court on time. A year after delivering the Albanus decision the court of appeal in

Eliud Njeru Nyaga V Republic (2007) eKLR stated,

“While we would reiterate the position that under the fair trial provisions of the constitution, an accused person must be brought to court within twenty four hours for non capital offences and within fourteen days for capital offences, yet it would be unreasonable to hold that any delay must amount to a constitutional breach and must result in automatic acquittal.”

The court noted that in the Albanus case the prosecution had had the opportunity to explain the cause of the delay but failed to offer an explanation. See also Ronald Manyonge Chepkui V Republic (2007) eKLR.

Once again the court of appeal in April 2007 deliberated on the question of the accused being brought to court within a given period of time in the case of Gerald Macharia Githuku V Republic (2007) eKLR. This case I must say stands out as a remarkably bold defence of due process and the constitutional right of an accused person. Its point of departure from previous jurisprudence on the subject is the subordination of the proven guilt of a violent robber to the constitutionality of his treatment by law enforcement authorities after his arrest.

The appellant in this case was arraigned before the Nairobi Chief Magistrate’s court on a charge of robbery with violence, which carries a mandatory sentence of death. The date of his arrest was stated in the charge sheet to have been January 13, 1995 while the date of his first arraignment in court was stated as January 30, 1995, that is 17 days later.

The appellant was tried, convicted and sentenced to death. His first appeal to the High Court was dismissed. However he brought a second appeal to the court of appeal in which his counsel argued that the High Court had erred in convicting and sentencing him when his constitutional rights had been violated.

Appeal Judges E.O. O’Kubasu, J.W. Onyango Otieno and W.S. Deverell JJA were unanimous in the defence of the accused’s constitutional rights. They held that though a mere delay of three days in bringing the appellant to court did not cause him any substantial prejudice and although the evidence showed that he was guilty as charged, nevertheless the failure by the prosecution to abide by the requirements of the constitution could not be disregarded. The prosecution, the judges found, on whom the burden of proof rested, had failed to satisfy the court that the appellant, who was charged with a capital offence, had been brought before the court as soon as was reasonably practicable.

More recently and in the case Paul Mwangi Murungu V. Republic Criminal Appeal of 2006 (unreported) the court of appeal went on to assert that:-

No.35

“We do not accept the proposition that the burden is upon an accused person to complain to a Magistrate or a Judge about the lawful detention in custody of the police.

The prosecuting authorities themselves know the time and date when an accused was arrested. They also know when the arrested person has been in custody for more than the twenty four hours allowed in the case of ordinary offences and fourteen days in the case of capital offences. Under section 72 (3) of the Constitution, the burden to explain the delay is on the prosecution, and we reject any proposition that the burden can only be discharged by the prosecution if the person accused raises a complaint. But in case

the prosecution does not offer any explanation then the court as the ultimate enforcer of the provisions of the constitution must raise the issue.”

It does appear from the authorities cited, that the violation of the accused’s fair trial provisions enshrined in our constitution cannot longer be taken lightly for they entitle the accused person to an automatic acquittal if no satisfactory explanation is forthcoming from the prosecution.

What happened in the instant case? There is no doubt at all that the accused was arrested on 28th December, 2007. The investigations according to the Investigating Officer were commenced and concluded on 5th January, 2008 in time yet the accused was not brought before court until 22nd January, 2008. The delay according to the Investigating Officer was occasioned by the desire by the family of the deceased to have the case handled by C.I.D, Murang’a and not the police station to which the case had been reported. I do not buy this reason. Since when have third parties influenced and determined which police stations should conduct investigations. Even if they had such powers, it cannot be at the expense of the accused. The accused’s constitutional rights cannot be abrogated at the instigation of third parties. The Investigating Officer ought to have thwarted these manoeuvres. The accused constitutional rights cannot be sacrificed at the alter of convenience or third parties’ unfounded fears of the competence or otherwise of police personnel in a particular police station investigating the case. The constitutional rights of a citizen are sacrosanct and cannot

I must repeat be subordinated to the whims and desires of third parties.

The law of the land has to be obeyed particularly by those entrusted to enforce it. As I have constantly stated, the police should be in the forefront of obeying the law and enforcing it. If the supreme law of the land says that an accused person has to be brought before court within 24 hours in the event of a non-capital offence and 14 days for a capital one, that law must be strictly observed failing which the police have a burden cast on them to satisfy the court that the accused had been brought before court as soon as was reasonably practicable. I do not think that the Investigating Officer herein has been able to discharge that heavy burden in the circumstances of this case.

We are no longer in 1980's where the fundamental rights of the citizens were trampled upon by the police. The courts of law could not stand up to challenge such conduct. As the court of appeal said recently the courts chose to see no evil and hear no evil giving rise to the infamous Nyayo house torture chambers. The consequences of this silence of conspiracy on the part of the courts was as the court of appeal went on to observe the infamous Nyayo house torture chambers, a history which the courts can never be proud of. It should never be allowed to happen again in this country. It was a result of the foregoing legacy that the citizens of this country lost faith in the judiciary particularly when it came to enforcement and securing the constitutional and fundamental rights of the citizenry. Time is nigh for the judiciary to rise to the occasion and reclaim its mantle by scrupulously applying the law that seeks to secure, enhance and protect the fundamental rights and freedoms of an accused person. A prosecution mounted in breach of the law is a violation of the rights of the accused and it is therefore a nullity. It matters not the nature of the violation. It matters not that the accused was brought to court one day after the expiry of the statutory period required to arraign him in court. Neither does it matter that the evidence against the accused is overwhelming. As long as that delay is not explained to the satisfaction of the court, the prosecution remains a nullity. For the court of appeal said again in the case of Albanus Mwasia Mutua:

In the end, and for the above reasons, I hold that the accused having been brought in court in breach of the provisions of section 72 (3) of the constitution, his continued prosecution is illegal and a violation of his constitutional rights. Accordingly he is acquitted of the charges.

I also order for his immediate release, unless he is otherwise lawful held.
